MANAGEMENT DISCUSSION SECTION

Operator: Greetings. Welcome to Walmart's fiscal 2022 first quarter earnings call. At this time, all participants are in a listen-only mode. A question-and-answer session will follow the formal presentation. [Operator instructions] As a reminder, this conference is being recorded.

I would now like to turn the conference over to your host, Dan Binder with Investor Relations.

Daniel Binder

Senior Vice President, Investor Relations & Corporate FP&A, Walmart, Inc.

Thank you, Rob. Good morning, and welcome to Walmart's first quarter fiscal 2022 earnings call. I'm joined by a few members of our executive team, including: Doug McMillon, Walmart's President and CEO; Brett Biggs, Executive Vice President and Chief Financial Officer; and John Furner, President and CEO of Walmart U.S. In a few moments, Doug and Brett will provide you with an update on the business and discuss first quarter results. That will followed by our question-and-answer session.

Before I turn the call over to Doug, let me remind you that today's call is being recorded and will include forward-looking statements. These statements are subject to risks and uncertainties that could cause actual results to differ materially from these statements. These risks and uncertainties include, but are not limited to, the factors identified in our filings with the SEC. Please review our press release and accompanying slide presentation for a cautionary statement regarding forward-looking statements, as well as our entire Safe Harbor statement and non-GAAP reconciliations on our website at stock.Walmart.com.

It is now my pleasure to turn the call over to Doug McMillon.

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

Good morning and thanks for joining today's call. Our results for the first quarter were strong. We're pleased with our sales momentum and adjusted EPS growth of 43% versus last year. We had strong performance in all three segments.

As the pandemic continues, it's impacting the countries where we operate in different ways. So our teams are adapting to overcome the challenges and deliver the strong results we're sharing today. We continue to be grateful to all of our associates for their dedication to serving others.

2021 brings its own unique challenges and uncertainty, but, overall, my optimism is higher than it was at the beginning of the year for several reasons. In the U.S., economic stimulus is clearly having an impact, but we also see encouraging signs that our customers want to get out and shop. Our execution is improving, despite the hurdles presented by the pandemic.

The second half will likely have more uncertainty than a normal year, but we like our position. Our stores are getting stronger. And our eCommerce capabilities are expanding as we continue to grow. Customers will decide how and when they want to shop. And they'll find us ready, whether they want to shop in store, pick up an order or have it delivered.

Key elements of our strategy are coming together nicely. We saw an acceleration of traffic in our stores, gained market share in grocery, improved in-stock levels and grew eCommerce sales globally by 43% in constant currency, excluding recent divestitures. Global eCommerce penetration now represents over 12% of total company sales, an increase of 340 basis points over last year.

Looking ahead, we'll navigate the supply chain challenges and inflationary pressures, whether that's in cost of goods or wages. We'll monitor our price gaps and adjust as appropriate, with both customers and shareholders in mind.

As it relates to COVID-19, the past several weeks have been more challenging in some countries. India, Canada, Chile and South Africa are priorities at the moment. Supporting our associates is our primary focus, but we're also investing our resources to support the countries as we find opportunities to do so. In India, we're donating oxygen concentrators, PPE and financial support.

When it comes to helping people get vaccinated, we're engaged in multiple countries. In the U.S., we've administered millions of doses. We're taking steps to encourage our associates and everyone to become vaccinated. Given CDC guidance, our U.S. associates that have been vaccinated can now work without a mask if they choose to, and we've added a cash incentive as one more step to encourage vaccinations. All of our Walmart and Sam's Club pharmacies in the U.S. are administering vaccines, and we can provide them without an appointment.

We've also collaborated with national and local organizations to support more than 200 community events across the country, so far. In India, we're facilitating vaccinations for our associates and their households and our Flipkart and PhonePe contractors, more than 200,000 people. Across the countries where we operate, we'll keep looking for more places to make a difference. This pandemic won't be over until it's over for everyone.

In addition to combating the pandemic, we also announced a new commitment to U.S. manufacturing during the quarter. Over the next 10 years, we've set a goal to purchase an additional $350 billion on items made, grown, or assembled in the U.S. We estimate this commitment will create more than 750,000 new American jobs and avoid 100 million metric tons of CO2 emissions.

We also want to make it easier for manufacturing in the U.S. to flourish. That's why we're launching an initiative called American Lighthouses. We'll bring together partners from the supplier community, academia and government, among other groups, to identify and overcome top-down barriers to U.S. production.

We also have other exciting news to share as we continue to invest in the technologies of tomorrow. In collaboration with ENGIE North America, a power generator and services company, we're adding more than 500 megawatts to the U.S. renewable grid through three separate wind projects. Together, these projects are expected to supply renewable energy to hundreds of stores, clubs and distribution facilities annually. That's enough renewable energy to power over 240,000 average American homes for a year. That's on top of the 4 gigawatts of renewable energy currently supplied by our projects globally. This is one more example of the important work we're doing to become a regenerative company.

Now let's talk more about our results for the quarter. Walmart U.S. had another strong quarter. The team delivered for our customers as they shopped in our stores and online and additional government stimulus payments created a tailwind. Our comp sales of 6%, including 37% growth in eCommerce, were strong. Strength was broad-based across categories, including apparel, home, hardlines and seasonal.

I recently visited stores, clubs and supply chain facilities in New Jersey, Delaware, DC, Ohio, New Mexico, Texas, Illinois, California and Florida. I continue to be grateful for the job our associates are doing, and I'm impressed by their spirit. They're operating safely in a pandemic, improving our in-stock and standards, working hard to fulfill pickup and delivery orders and vaccinating millions. Doing all those things at once isn't easy, and we've had our challenges. But our associates continue to step up, and they're strengthening our position as they do it.

In the U.S., our first party retail business is strong, but we're also making good progress in other important parts of our business. Marketplace GMV, fulfillment services and advertising income with Walmart Connect are all strong.

The flywheel we showed you in February is being built. Each component is positioning us to serve the customer better, while diversifying the model. As we previously shared, the top of the flywheel starts with being the best, first place people shop. Store remodels, investments in pickup and delivery capacity and sales of Walmart+ fall into this category of activities. We need more capacity to get ahead of demand, and we remain convinced these investments are smart ones. This is one of the keys to selling more Walmart+ memberships, which is an important piece of our strategy over time.

In addition to work at the top of the flywheel, we'll continuously add brands, assortment and capabilities to our eCommerce general merchandise business, with first party inventory and Marketplace expansion. We'll invest in our general merchandise business and grow in higher margin categories. The announced acquisition of Zeekit is a great example. This start-up combines fashion and technology through a dynamic virtual fitting room and underscores the desire to grow our apparel business aggressively.

We continue our work to build a larger Health & Wellness business and help customers and associates have a better experience when it comes to their healthcare. Our acquisition of MeMD is a big step in that direction. Adding a telehealth capability was important. Just as we're doing with core retail, we're building an omnichannel Health & Wellness business.

At Sam's Club, the momentum continues. Our items are improving. Membership and sales comps are strong. And the team keeps adding and scaling capabilities, like curbside. We're seeing strength in categories associated with social gatherings, as well as an increase in Business Member activity. Categories like restaurant supplies are coming back. We saw tremendous growth in membership income for the quarter, and overall membership counts are at an all-time high. Like our stores' business, government stimulus helped our results, but I'm confident the underlying business is strong and moving in the right direction for our members.

Our International team has been busy transitioning the portfolio to higher growth markets, and it's working. As you'll recall, we recently divested our businesses in the UK, Japan and Argentina. And as a result, net sales for the quarter declined about 11% year-on-year. On a like-for-like basis, when we remove the recently divested markets, net sales increased 5.1%. These are good results and demonstrate the segment's ability to deliver growth for the enterprise.

In India, for the first quarter, Flipkart and PhonePe continued to experience strong growth, as annualized total payment value run rate at PhonePe grew by more than 150% versus last year. At Flipkart, monthly active customers and users are key metrics, and we're performing well. Our recent announcement of our intent to acquire Cleartrip, a leading online travel company, underscores our commitment to transform the customer experience through digital commerce.

Our growing base of customers means we need to continue to add new capabilities, including areas such as logistics and data storage. The recently announced partnership with Adani Group will help us do just that.

Walmex continues to be strong and the flywheel is coming to life. Our assets in this market uniquely position us to serve customers in new ways, and they're responding. In Mexico, sales in eCommerce increased 166%, and our same-day delivery service is now available from 680 locations. Similar to the U.S., we're expanding our business to include more than just traditional retail. A few areas of note include: the advertising business, which saw an increase of more than 100% in new advertisers; and our new mobile phone services network that provides voice, data and home broadband, bringing access and value to our customers. We doubled the number of users of these services during the quarter, as customers enjoy the convenience of adding data to their plan right at the checkout.

In China, our eCommerce business and Sam's Club continue to resonate with customers and members. Helped by a strong Chinese New Year, the club business delivered strong sales across all categories, leading to double-digit comp sales growth. We grew overall eCommerce sales 60% on top of impressive growth last year.

Results from our business in Canada were good, even as lockdown measures intensified as the quarter progressed. We started with strong sales in stores and eCommerce, but COVID-19-related restrictions on sales of certain merchandise categories towards the end of the quarter pressured our performance. The underlying business is strong, and we're confident in our omnichannel model for this market.

I'll close today by thanking everyone for a strong quarter. It all starts with our associates and their focus on serving our customers and members. We're being aggressive and dialing up innovation and speed. We're moving fast to learn new skills and to sharpen our edge on existing ones, and we'll move even faster as we invest in key areas to accelerate growth into the future. Thank you for your interest in our company.

Now, I'll turn it over to Brett.

Brett M. Biggs

Chief Financial Officer & Executive Vice President, Walmart, Inc.

Thanks, Doug. We're pleased with strong first quarter results and the continued momentum in the business, with both strong sales and profit growth. While stimulus spending benefited results, it's exciting to see the continued progress in our underlying business as we execute on the fundamentals and progress with our omni strategy. Newer businesses within our ecosystem, like advertising and fulfillment services, are growing rapidly, helping margins and allowing us to continue to invest in other strategic priorities. Our unique assets, value proposition and financial strength put us in a great competitive position to win, keeping the customer at the center of all we do.

As we expected we're growing grocery market share again in the U.S. compared to last year, according to Nielsen. Value and assortment will continue to resonate with customers, as does the convenience we provide with our omni shopping options.

Now, let's discuss Q1 results. As we've mentioned previously, the divestitures in the UK, Japan and Argentina significantly affect year-over-year comparisons. We outlined the anticipated effect of divestitures on key financial metrics when we provided guidance in February. So my comments today will focus on the underlying business, excluding the effect of divestitures.

Total constant currency revenue growth was strong [ph] at 5.8% to more than $132 billion (13:15), with underlying business trends continuing to improve, while stimulus spending benefited U.S. sales even versus last year's consumer stock-up phase and initial stimulus.

Walmart U.S. comp sales were stronger than expected, up 6% in the quarter and up 16% on a two-year stack. Sam's Club grew comp sales nearly 11%, excluding fuel and tobacco, and International sales growth was strong, increasing more than 5% in constant currency with strength in India, Canada and China.

Globally, eCommerce sales growth remains robust at more than 40%. Gross profit margin increased 96 basis points, led by Walmart U.S., reflecting mix shifts, due, in part, to stimulus spending, lower markdowns and lapping last year's COVID-related stock-up which was more focused on food and consumables. As expected, SG&A expenses were pressured by increased wage and technology investments in the U.S., partially offset by lower COVID-related costs, resulting in 21 basis points of deleverage. Overall, though, I feel good about expense focus across the company.

Operating income on a constant currency basis was up over 28%, and adjusted EPS of $1.69 was 43% higher than last year's Q1 adjusted EPS. The divested businesses contributed $0.07 of EPS, due to partial period ownership in the quarter. GAAP EPS was $0.97, which includes net losses on our equity investments as well as the incremental loss in international divestitures. Operating cash flow declined about $4 billion, due primarily to inventory increases versus last year when in-stock levels were much lower due to stock-up shopping. We stepped up buybacks during the quarter with $2.8 billion of share repurchase. We continue to feel great about the value of the company.

Now, let's discuss the quarterly results for each segment. Walmart U.S. had another strong quarter, aided by stimulus spending and underlying improvements in the grocery business, as well as strength in re-opening categories, such as travel, celebration and personal care. We're particularly encouraged by the improving trends in store transactions, which turned solidly positive in April for the first time in a year.

We also saw strong market share gains in grocery, according to Nielsen, and continued strength in eCommerce. Comp sales, excluding fuel, increased 6%, resulting in a strong two-year stack comp of 16%. Sales strength was broad-based across channels, with eCommerce sales growth of 37%.

The omni strategy continues to resonate, as customers utilize all the shopping options we offer, and we continue to expand pickup and delivery capacity from stores. Customer trip consolidation led to a nearly 10% increase in average basket size with 3% fewer transactions. Strong sales trends were led by apparel, home and lawn and garden. Grocery sales declined against a uniquely tough comparison, but comps were up low double digits on a two-year stack basis, including mid-teens growth in food categories held by strong price positioning, improving in-stocks and expanded store hours relative to last year.

We're pleased with the progress of strategic growth initiatives, such as Walmart Connect Advertising, eCommerce Marketplace and Walmart Fulfillment Services. Advertising revenue is robust, with triple-digit growth for the quarter. Gross profit rate was strong, up more than 140 basis points, reflecting favorable mix shift to higher margin general merchandise categories and lower markdowns. Margins were also helped by lapping last year's COVID-related closures of business centers and auto care centers.

SG&A expenses deleveraged 49 basis points, as increased associate wage investments and increased technology spend were partially offset by an approximate $400 million reduction in COVID-related costs versus last year. Operating income was very strong, [ph] up (16:34) nearly 27%. Inventory increased 16%, reflecting strong sales growth and lapping last year's COVID-related effects on inventory. We continue to monitor industry challenges related to transit and port delays, and our merchants have taken steps to mitigate the challenges including adding extra lead time to orders.

The fundamentals of the U.S. business continue to improve, and we're confident we have the strategy, structure and people in place to serve customers and reach our goals this year and beyond.

International delivered strong Q1 results, with net sales growth of 5.1% in constant currency, including strength in India, Canada and China, despite many markets being negatively affected toward the end of the quarter by a resurgence of COVID. The benefit of strategic portfolio realignment to focus on higher growth markets is becoming more evident in top line growth. ECommerce sales increased approximately 64%, and penetration grew more than 570 basis points to about 16% of sales. Currency benefited sales by approximately $0.7 billion.

Comp sales in Mexico declined slightly against a tough comparison, but were up low double digits on a two-year stack basis as the omnichannel strategy continues to accelerate. The Mexico business has made good progress expanding alternative revenue and profit streams within the ecosystem, including doubling the number of digital advertisers and continuing to see strong growth in mobile services.

Canada comps increased 3.4%, with more than 115% growth in eCommerce sales, despite headwinds later in the quarter from COVID-related government restrictions on the sales of nonessential categories like apparel and general merchandise.

China comps increased 1.3% and were up 13% on a two-year stack. Strong Chinese New Year sales, continued strength of Sam's Clubs and eCommerce growth of 60% all contributed to the result. Flipkart continues to perform well, driving strong and sustainable eCommerce GMV growth and strong trends in monthly active customers and users, even as the teams deal with the challenges [ph] of resurging (18:22) COVID cases in India.

International operating income was strong, up more than 21%, as better sales mix and fewer markdowns in certain markets benefited margins in addition to continued focus on expenses.

The momentum at Sam's Club continued in the first quarter, with comp sales growth of 10.6%, excluding fuel and tobacco, due, in part, to stimulus spending. On a two-year stack basis, comps were up nearly 27%. Comps benefited from both increased ticket and transactions. Strength was broad-based across categories, with home and apparel leading the way.

ECommerce sales were strong, increasing 47%, led by strength in curbside pickup at the Club. We're pleased with the continued strong membership trends, as membership income grew about 13%. We achieved a new high for overall membership counts during the quarter and saw higher renewal rates, including strong first-year renewals and rising Plus penetration. Operating income increased more than 16% in Q1, but excluding the negative impact of fuel, profit increased 33%.

Now, let's turn to guidance. Our typical practice is to not update guidance until the second quarter release, but we're in an unusual period where Q1 stimulus led to meaningful sales and profit tailwinds that weren't contemplated when we provided guidance in February. The guidance discussed here assumes that COVID conditions continue to improve and there won't be significant additional government stimulus packages for the remainder of the year.

We now anticipate higher full-year enterprise sales growth than originally projected, primarily due to the strong Q1 performance and our initial forecast for Q2. Excluding the impact of divestitures, consolidated net sales growth is now expected to be up low to mid-single digits versus our original guidance of low single-digit increase. We're also raising full-year guidance for operating income and EPS to reflect the strong performance in Q1 and our expectation for a potentially better second quarter than previously expected.

On a constant currency basis and excluding the impact of divestitures, we now expect full-year consolidated operating income to increase by high single digits for the year and EPS to increase by low double digits, which is an increase from our prior guidance of both being flat to up slightly.

Walmart U.S. operating income is now expected to increase high single digits versus our original guidance of a slight increase. The second quarter started off a bit better than originally anticipated, as stimulus spending continues to benefit certain general merchandise categories, and we expect grocery market share gains to continue. We now anticipate Q2 EPS, excluding divestitures, will be up low single digits and it assumes a low single digit Walmart U.S. comp sales increase, excluding fuel.

The COVID pandemic continues to create both tailwinds and headwinds for our business. While Q1 was aided by stimulus spending, primarily in the U.S., certain international markets continue to be negatively affected by the resurgence in COVID cases and related government restrictions and operations, particularly in India and Canada. Given continued uncertainty, we're maintaining our original guidance for the back half of the year, and we'll update you as we gain clarity on key external variables related to the health crisis and their potential impact on our business and the global economy.

Again, I'm very pleased with the first quarter results and feel good about the underlying strength of the business. Thank you for your time and interest this morning and we'd be happy to take your questions.

QUESTION AND ANSWER SECTION

Operator: Thank you. [Operator instructions] Thank you. And our first question is from the line of Karen Short with Barclays. Please proceed with your question.

Karen Short

Analyst, Barclays Capital, Inc.

Q

Hi. Thanks very much. I wanted to focus on growth rate because you've obviously mentioned that a couple times just in this conference call and the presentation. But I guess what I'm wondering is what is your approach to pricing, given the price gaps that we're seeing with conventional and that combined with the fact that we're seeing unprecedented cost inflation? And I guess maybe asking it a little differently, with respect to your broader goals for 2021, how important is recapturing share in grocery?

John R. Furner

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Hey, good morning. This is John Furner. Thanks for the question. First, let me just start by saying a big thank you to our associates and our team around the country who helped us deliver the quarter. And on the heels of such an interesting year last year, they've done a great job improving conditions, both in store and online, and we're really proud of their performance in food. Glad to start with that question.

Over the quarter, we've seen a lot of progress in food with our inventory, considering we started the quarter with a very large ice storm that affected supply chains. And then, as we noted, late in the quarter, performance that resulted in market share gains in food. There is a view of this that we showed back in February, which is our flywheel. And the top of the flywheel is our food and consumable business and our Supercenter business, which is really important to the customer journey. And over the last 12 months, specifically on your question on price, over the last 12 months, we saw our price gaps improve versus the market. And our merchants are working hard to ensure that that will continue.

These market share gains that we saw in the latter part of the quarter are very encouraging. And it's great to see that we're positioned well when customers need to shift. When customers shifted last year to shopping online, we were able to perform at that time. And then, we've seen some shift back into store in the quarter and the performance is represented in the first quarter is a reflection of that. So we feel good about the price gaps. These are things that you always work on, considering how many levers merchants have and everything going on in the market. But we feel good about our position in the market, and we'll continue to focus on share gains the rest of the year.

Karen Short

Analyst, Barclays Capital, Inc.

Q

Thanks.

Operator: The next question is from the line of Paul Trussell with Deutsche Bank. Please proceed with your question.

Paul Trussell

Analyst, Deutsche Bank Securities, Inc.

Q

Good morning. And strong results. Just wanted to dig a little bit more on your updated guidance for the year. Maybe if you can give a little bit of color as it relates to the improvement in your 2Q expectations. And then, just provide a little bit more context on how you're thinking about first half versus second half of the year.

Brett M. Biggs

Chief Financial Officer & Executive Vice President, Walmart, Inc.

Hey, Paul. This is Brett. Good to hear from you. Yeah, as we got through the first quarter and we started understanding how strong the underlying business is – as John said, it started out a little challenging with the weather we had in February. But we saw the business strengthening as we went through the quarter, And, certainly, some of that is going to be stimulus. We readily admit that. But you're seeing customers get back out again because it feels like things are opening back up, particularly in certain parts of the country. So we felt like it was the right time to go ahead and update guidance different than we typically do, given the strong performance. And then, what we've seen in the early parts of the second quarter, we felt that we should go ahead and update guidance as we did.

We haven't said anything really about the back half. As I said in my comments, still a lot of uncertainties that are out there with headwinds and tailwinds and they'll play themselves out over the next several months. But I think all of us feel more confident than we did in February and felt like updating guidance was the right thing to do at this point.

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

A

Paul, this is Doug. I would just add that when we imagine back-to-school, Halloween, Thanksgiving, Christmas and what families are going to want to do, we get really excited about the potential of that and are buying in a consistent way with how we are imagining it.

Paul Trussell

Analyst, Deutsche Bank Securities, Inc.

Q

Thank you. And just a really quick follow-up. Just on the margins, just digging a little bit more in 1Q, Brett, could you talk a little bit more about what was the impact of the strategic wage and technology investments that you made?

Brett M. Biggs

Chief Financial Officer & Executive Vice President, Walmart, Inc.

A

Gross margins obviously were up significantly in the U.S. about 140 basis points. We had really strong general merchandise sales this year comparing that against a quarter last year that was very heavily influenced by food and consumables, so you get that dynamic on gross margin. Certainly the wage investments had an impact. I won't get into the specifics of that. It did cause us, primarily caused us deleverage in the first quarter, but we knew that was coming. We're glad we did that and certainly ahead of the environment you're seeing right now, wage increases, tech increases as well. But it's offset by some other things that we're leveraging across the company. Paul, I still feel good about the overall expense discipline and focus that I see across the company. And, as we said, when we get through this year with the increased wage investments going forward, I still feel good about our ability to leverage long term.

Paul Trussell

Analyst, Deutsche Bank Securities, Inc.

Q

Thank you. Best of luck.

Operator: Our next question is from the line of Simeon Gutman with Morgan Stanley. Please proceed with your question.

Simeon Gutman

Analyst, Morgan Stanley & Co. LLC

Q

Hi, good morning, everyone. So I have maybe two-part question, but I'll make it one question. First, you referred, Doug and Brett, in the transcript a lot of mentions of alternative profit streams or profit pools. Can you talk about your visibility around the business and if these pools are giving you more confidence in sort of how you're managing the business, it gives you more I guess wherewithal to invest back into it? And then the second part of the question is, Doug, you mentioned the flywheel and you're investing in capacity ahead of growth. Any update on when there could be an inflection? Or is it rolling? Or does it start at some point in the next fiscal year where you're at a good place and maybe push a little bit harder on Walmart+? Thank you.

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

A

Yeah, Simeon, this is Doug. I'll go first. As it relates to alternative profit pools, John can chime in here as well. But I'm excited about Marketplace. I'm excited about what's happening with fulfillment services. Walmart Connect performance was good. We do have strong visibility into that. And you're starting to see it happen in Mexico, too. And as we've said to you before, this strategy makes sense for us everywhere in our key markets. So the P&L starting to change its shape, as we described in February, even more than a year ago, and that does give us some room.

John R. Furner

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Good morning, Simeon. This is John. I'll just add on and say that we are excited about the three areas you mentioned: Marketplace; WFS, Walmart Fulfillment Services; and Connect, like we said earlier. Really optimistic about the results with Walmart Connect with triple-digit growth. That platform is something that we've been working on for a while. And, as we talked to you a few months ago, it helps connect buyers, sellers and suppliers in a way that's unique to Walmart and optimistic about what we see there.

On fulfillment services, it's great to see the team expanding capacity. We know we have seller demand. My team and I have spent a number of hours listening to sellers, talking to sellers and figuring out all the tools that we need to add. So this is important for their businesses as well. And then, as we said in the quarter, we had 37% growth in eCommerce on top of a big number last year. We've basically doubled the business the last couple years. So excited about all three of those, and they're clearly businesses that will help us with our flywheel going forward.

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

A

As it relates to capacity getting ahead of growth, it's starting to happen. The plan that we had for the year is being executed. And as you're in stores, you can see the stress that some of our stores are under in terms of the volume going through for pickup and delivery orders. And in some stores, we're expanding space. Capital is going towards that. In some stores, we'll be putting in automation to really press the top end of this thing, where we know we're going to have that kind of demand, and the team's executing against that. And we continue, Simeon, to be excited about it. And we'll go as fast as we can go this year and do it well, and I think we'll learn a lot from it. And we're very confident that that capacity is going to be needed.

Simeon Gutman

Q

Thanks. Best of luck.

Operator: Our next question is from the line of Bob Drbul with Guggenheim. Please proceed with your question.

Robert Drbul

Analyst, Guggenheim Securities LLC

Q

Hey. Good morning. Just a couple questions. I mean, largely around gross margin and pricing and inflation, just wondered if you can talk a little bit about what you're seeing on the inflationary side, different categories. And you did mention balancing between customers and shareholders. Just sort of how you're approaching that and sort of tying it together when you look at the consumer focused more on value versus convenience, just wondered if you could maybe give us a few examples on where you think you're making progress around that value offering in this environment. Thanks.

John R. Fumer

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Yeah, thanks for the question. This is John again. First, as we said, we're really pleased with the performance in food and the team has just done a great job getting the entire supply chain back in stock, including stores. We've got changes in the stores where we're shifting more of our stocking to overnight, so we can free up more capacity during the day for things like picking, as Doug said, and do that in a way that's conducive to customer shopping, so excited to make those changes.

As far as price gaps, we've always had a principle here that Every Day Low Price is important. In the quarter, we had about 30% more Rollbacks in stores than what we would have had a year ago. Some other things that are important are the mix. Not only the mix of the entire box, but the mix within food. Pleased with the share gains that happened in meat and produce and bakery. So even within the food categories, the mix has been favorable to categories that tend to have better margins, which is enabling us to maintain price positions that we've been running. And our gap expanded last year versus the market. We are pleased with the gap. We're proud of the gap. And we'll continue to use all the levers we can to maintain those kinds of price gaps.

The merchants at Walmart this year are even more prepared than years in the past to be able to manage that because of the channels they mix. Our merchants across the business can manage the channels from stores, to eCommerce first party, eCommerce third party. And then, finally, with the additional revenue and profit streams we mentioned with Walmart Connect, Marketplace and fulfillment services, that will just help us going forward mix to make sure that we have the right gap for customers.

I do agree with you that value could be more important than convenience last year, but value has been an important pillar of ours for a very long time.

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

A

This mentality that John described related to Rollbacks is important to underline. It applies in International. It applies in Sam's Club as well. Bob, I'm reminded of a conversation in the early 1990s. As an assistant buyer in food, my supervisor walked into the room with a few of us and said, we're short on our profit number for the month. I need you all to find price reductions that you can put in place quickly. Bring them to me by the end of the day. And I thought I misheard him. How do you lower prices and increase profit? And that's the beauty of retail and of mix and these Supercenters and now with eCommerce and Marketplace and fulfillment services and Walmart Connect, we've got all these levers to be able to find places to go upstream, do things differently than other people are doing it. So to have 30% more Rollbacks in place right now in Walmart U.S., for example, positions us really well.

Q

Hi. Thank you. Thanks for taking our question. I know that in-stocks was an area that you mentioned during 2020 that was hard to manage, given the strong demand. Just wondered currently are there any areas within your inventory of categories that are light or you're still working to build back.

John R. Furner

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Hey, good morning. Thanks for the question. Certainly, 2020 was a challenge when it comes to inventory flow with all the phases we went through from the stock-up phase to people moving into their home and then demand and supply chain challenges all across that were related to the pandemic. Early in the quarter, I felt like we were making pretty good progress. And then, we had this ice storm, where we had just a record number of locations closed for a few days, which put some stress on the supply chain. And then as we got later into the quarter, certainly we see improvements in our food and consumable business compared to what they would have been a year ago.

In general, general merchandise has been a bit mixed. It's better in many cases, but there are some pockets where we continue to chase demand, things like adult bicycles, some of our categories in consumer electronics. We're monitoring things like delays at the ports and other factors in the supply chain, and we'll watch all those things closely to continue to react. But definitely some pockets in general merchandise that we're still chasing, even as we speak today.

Peter Benedict

Q

Good morning, guys. I just had a question on U.S. eCommerce, maybe for John. Just obviously the pickup activity continues to scale, but just curious on the home delivery front, maybe what you're pushing on there, just any updates and also your micro or market fulfillment center tests. Just curious kind of how you're approaching that and just your thoughts on kind of the home delivery side of fulfillment of eCommerce. Thanks.

John R. Furrer

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Sure. Sure. Peter, thanks for the question. In general, we have been working on capacity improvements and capacity growth when it comes to online pickup and delivery from stores. That's something that we have been tackling for some time now. It accelerated last year. And we managed things what we call things like slot utilization or available slots, and we have more slots available for picking for scheduled orders than we've ever had. We also have more capacity to ship from store, which leads to I think the second part of your question, which is the in-home or the delivery at home.

And I'd say a couple things there. And number one, we are expanding our what we call our Walmart InHome services, which we just picked up another market. And that's where we deliver food and other items from stores all the way into the home, including in the refrigerator. We have our market fulfillment centers that you asked about. We have several that are in construction. We expect to be launching those either late Q2 or early Q3, so we'll be able to talk about that more once those launch.

And then, finally, we are excited about our last mile business. We've been operating our first delivery vans that are Walmart branded in a market here in Arkansas and we're learning a lot as we go forward. But we see lots of opportunities to serve customers, whether it's in store, it's at their home, or it's at the curb and they want to do pickup.

We want to be extremely flexible and be able to serve customers any way they want. Last year, there was such a shift of people that were wanting to have deliveries shifted at home from shopping in store. I think what we'll see more this year is a balance between the at-home deliveries, shopping in store and pickup as people get back out. But, as Brett alluded to earlier, that's assuming that conditions with the pandemic continue to improve. And we'll be ready, should things change in either direction.

Operator: Our next question is coming from the line of Michael Lasser with UBS. Please proceed with your question.

Michael Lasser

Analyst, UBS Securities LLC

Q

Good morning. Thanks a lot for taking my question. Can you quantify two of the comments that you made in the script? One was from Brett. He noted that the guidance increase was mostly due to stimulus-related spending. So how do you parse out the 1Q results and what you're expecting in 2Q, the impact from the stimulus in 2Q? And Doug noted that Walmart+ is an important driver over time. So can you give us a sense for where that program stands today and how it should unfold from here? Thank you so much.

Brett M. Biggs

Chief Financial Officer & Executive Vice President, Walmart, Inc.

Hi, Michael. This is Brett. Good to hear from you. Yeah, I mean, a couple things I mentioned in various ways in the script is the underlying business feels good, and we're more optimistic about that part of it. Certainly, stimulus benefited our results in the first quarter. But you can also get a sense of how we increased the second quarter. You know what the original guidance was and how we increased the guidance for that quarter. So that should give you a little bit of sense of how we're thinking about stimulus versus the underlying business.

I can tell you, though, it is challenging to pick out exactly the impacts of stimulus because of the types of categories that you see benefited by stimulus are also categories you see benefited by the economy opening up, particularly on the general merchandise side. So it makes it a little more challenging to pick through that.

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

Michael, on membership, inside Walmart, this is a new program for us. The number one driver of selling memberships is the grocery Supercenter pickup and delivery. And, as we said before, capacity is our issue there. And, as we said in February, our focus is on the quality of that experience, not the quantity. We want some time to work on NPS. We want to build capacity. We are marketing the program. And long term, it'll be important to us. But we've gotten so many other things going on, with stores improving in traffic and eCommerce growing and Marketplace and all that kind of stuff, we don't think that Walmart+ should be the primary focus at the moment for us with all these other opportunities. So we'll keep growing it.

At some point, I'm sure we'll share some more information with you guys about it. I know there's a request for that because of streaming services and how much people are talking about subscriptions and memberships these days. So that's – John, I don't know if you want to add anything, but that's how I feel about it right now.

John R. Furner

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Yeah, I completely agree. And the big thing that we're doing is creating capacity to be able to serve more and to begin work on market fulfillment centers, where we can use locations as hubs for other stores and spokes. We've got a lot of really encouraging supply chain work going on that would help us use the right algorithms to be able to pull inventory from all across the network and be able to serve people. So encouraging just in the last few months to see that not only the capacity has gone up, but eCommerce results have been strong, delivery from stores has been strong, delivery from fulfillment centers has been strong. So these capabilities we're putting in place will be a great foundation for this program as we move forward.

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

A

Having a digital relationship with customers is important, and that takes various forms. What we've seen with the app downloads, for example, and app popularity and what happened last year in particular with pickup and delivery, a really large expansion in the number of digital relationships, which helps us with data and helps us be a retailer of the future. Overall, we feel good about what's happening in those areas.

John R. Furner

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Yeah, those relationships, I believe, will continue to grow because of things like the improvements in technology we're working on, improving the app and its core experience, acquisitions like Zeekit and MeMD are also other ways that customers will be able to connect with Walmart effectively, and we'll be able to help them with more and more of their life and take friction out and make things simple for them.

Q

Thank you. Good morning, everyone. We had a question on general merchandise improvements. You've talked a lot about food, but I'd like to give you some time to talk about general merchandise. You've brought in new talent there. You've made some strategic tuck-in acquisitions and some strategic partnerships as well. So help us think about what we should be looking for in terms of progress on general merchandise. And maybe if you could tie that back to some of your initiatives around Marketplace as well, what you're learning from your digital growth that might be driving some of your in-store decisions around general merchandise. Thank you.

John R. Furner

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Sure. Let me take that one. This is John again. We're really excited about the performance in general merchandise in the quarter. As you mentioned, we did make a number of changes with talent over the last year. Probably the biggest change was last July, when we pulled all of the channels together. And traditionally, we had teams of people we called category specialists that were online. And then we had buyers that were in store. And we're referring to them all as merchants, because the merchants now have the customer relationship across all channels. And the team has spent a lot of time thinking through and working on the right programs to determine what in our assortment goes in store, what's 1P and then what's 3P.

I'll give you an example. Just last week, I was in Minneapolis visiting one of our suppliers, Nordic Ware, who makes cookware here in the United States. And we went through the number of items that they have in stores, what's doing well, what's going to improve. And then their entire catalog is available on the Marketplace. So our merchants are able to manage the assortment across channels and that gives them more levers to be able to serve the customer in a way that's frictionless and very clear.

But in the quarter, we definitely saw some changes with the way customers shop, partly due to stimulus, but also just behavior changes. Brett talked about it earlier. Categories like personal care improving. Travel is starting to really kick back in. And when you look at all the categories that are selling at Walmart, you can tell a lot about what's going with customers across the country. So we definitely saw behaviors that are starting to reflect more opening up and getting back out and going to see people.

Our Health & Wellness business has been extremely helpful at administering millions of vaccines in the quarter. And then with some of the changes, even in the last week, we expect some of these changes with the customer could continue, but we'll continue to watch that as the year moves on.

Operator: Thank you. Our next question is from the line of Edward Yruma with KeyBanc. Please proceed with your question.

Edward Yruma

Analyst, KeyBanc Capital Markets, Inc.

Q

Hey, thanks for taking the question. Obviously, some very positive commentary on store traffic. I know you noted that April saw an inflection. When you see that store traffic begin to really improve, are you seeing any other changes within the eComm business, either pickup or delivery? And then as a follow-up, as that traffic improves, are you seeing any favorable mix shifts? Thank you.

John R. Furner

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

So the traffic in store, the count of traffic, as we said, definitely changed in April. Probably late March a bit. That's when we started to cycle some of the really big stock-up trips and what was happening last year were fewer trips and big consolidation. It did put a lot of strain and stress on inventory and things like paper goods and food and consumables.

So this year, as that shift began to occur and we saw the share numbers begin to reflect gains in the food categories, I think it was a combination of people getting back out in comparison to last year but also some normalization in terms of the frequency of food that's purchased.

Specifically within channels, strong growth between all three, as we said, in the U.S. The total comp was 6%, including eCommerce growth of 37%. And then the eCommerce growth is a mix of what's being shipped to people's homes from fulfillment centers or stores and inclusive of pickup.

Finally, I'd just say that we continue to expand capacity in all channels. We're excited about the expansion of slots available for shopping in stores. We're excited about the amount of capacity we have in stores to ship to people's home. And then, we're continuing to work and invest in the supply chain to have more capacity going forward for pure first party eCommerce.

Operator: Our next question is from the line of Michael Baker with D.A. Davidson. Please proceed with your questions.

Michael Baker

Analyst, D.A. Davidson & Co.

Q

Thanks, guys. Just two follow-ups, if I could. One, the 100 basis point or so gross margin improvement, can you sort of parse that out and how much is coming just from the mix from general merchandise and how much is being supported by the strength in the alternative businesses and if not an exact quantification, maybe directionally? And then the second question, just to follow up on the comp guidance, so first quarter was better than expected. Second quarter guidance is up. Yet the full year comp, if I'm understanding it correctly, didn't change. So should we read into something – is that a decline in the back half? Or just too early to change it? Or low single digits is a pretty wide range, I suppose. It could be anywhere between 1% and 3% or 4%. So what do we read into that, not changing the full-year guidance? Thank you.

Brett M. Biggs

Chief Financial Officer & Executive Vice President, Walmart, Inc.

Hey, this is Brett. Appreciate the question. Yeah, I think on the – I'll start with the second one on comp guidance. What you said about low single digits being a fairly wide range, that is the case. It is a wide range and when you look at the big numbers of Walmart U.S., it ends up in a really wide range. So I wouldn't read anything into that. We feel great about the first quarter. And the second quarter started out pretty well, as we've said.

On gross margin, I'll say – start, John, you can come in – the biggest change, of course, was the general merchandise sales strength that we're seeing this year versus the food and consumables strength that we saw last year in the first quarter. And also when you start seeing strength in general merchandise, which we've had really over the last several quarters, you see fewer markdowns. There's a lot of add-on benefits that come from that for gross margin.

John R. Furrer

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Yeah, let me just add a bit on to the margin question. Certainly, there was strength in general merchandise in the quarter. We talked about the strength in food. And food was more balanced this year than what we would have seen last year. Last year, we were really heavy in dry grocery and stock-up items as the pandemic began.

So the strength in share gains that we saw in the first quarter in food, I think, most specifically, meat, produce, bakery and grocery, but leading in the fresh areas is certainly helpful.

And the third point I think I'd make is inventory positioning at the end of the quarter. Our inventory level is up, which is a good thing. Last year, we had big stock-outs in grocery and in general merchandise, so I feel much better about our inventory position. As Brett mentioned, our inventory is clean and we've been really disciplined about ensuring that we're clearing up end of season and seasonal, so we feel great there.

And then, the last thing I would say is the drivers of eCommerce contributed profit rates have been strong. Having merchants in the position of having all channels [ph] in their re-mix, given a (49:55) category and what the customer wants is helping with the drivers of eCommerce, which would include things like contributed profit rates, Walmart Connect, et cetera.

Michael Baker

Analyst, D.A. Davidson & Co.

Great. Thank you. I appreciate that color.

Operator: Thank you. Our next question is from the line of Kelly Bania with BMO Capital. Please proceed with your question.

Kelly Bania

Analyst, BMO Capital Markets Corp.

Hi. Good morning. Thanks for taking our questions. Also wanted to touch a little bit on general merchandise. So with – in the U.S. So with low 20% growth, just curious if you think you gained market share there. We were thinking maybe 26% market growth, which is kind of rough estimate, but just curious how you're thinking about that, how you measure that. And also how your efforts with Walmart Fulfillment Services and third party are maybe contributing to your general merchandise growth.

John R. Furner

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

This is John. Let me take your first question first. The share performance in general merchandise, we think, is about flat to last year. And we manage it a month in arrears. Our data is for February and March, so we feel good about the performance through the first two-thirds of the quarter. Certainly saw, as you said, strength across general merchandise in the 20% range. So I think we're positioned well, feel good about where the share is versus a year ago, particularly excited about performances in categories like home and apparel in the quarter and the positioning we have going into the second quarter.

Certainly some tightness in the supply chain, as we mentioned earlier, in select categories where we've had high demand and stresses in the supply chain. But we're watching that carefully and feel good about the improvements in in-stock all across the business, including the fulfillment centers and stores. But again, I think we're most encouraged by the demand in seeing things like travel and other things open up and being able to be ready for customers is important as we move forward.

And then, the second part of your question on fulfillment services, we've done a number of capacity improvements that are coming online this year. So we're excited about the impact those will have not only on the top line and for the customer, but also for our sellers. Our sellers are looking for more services and ability to ship, and it's a great way to enable small businesses for growth. So as the year goes on, we'll see more and more capacity come online for our fulfillment service business.

Operator: Our next question is from the line of Scot Ciccarelli with RBC Capital Markets. Please proceed with your question.

Scot Ciccarelli

Analyst, RBC Capital Markets LLC

Good morning, guys. My question is on the U.S. EBIT increase that you saw. I'm wondering how much of that increase was attributable to what I would assume is a structurally more profitable eCommerce operation, given that the growth in scale you were able to garner last year. And related to that, any updated color regarding the profitability run rate of eCommerce today?

John R. Furner

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

Good morning, Scot. This is John. Specifically, on your question on eComm, we feel good about the drivers of the eComm profitability, which is contributed profit rates and that would be gross margins less the cost of shipping. We also feel good about the alternative revenue streams that are included in eCommerce, which are things like the Marketplace, fulfillment services. Like I said earlier, we're expanding capacity and we know we have seller demand. And we're really proud of the triple-digit growth in Walmart Connect. So all of those added together are helpful in the eCommerce P&L.

On the breakout, we actually are not breaking out the difference in stores and eComm because it has just become so blurred. As we've transitioned to an omni business, we have our merchants that are overseeing all channels by category. Stores are acting as stores, they act as pickup centers and, in some cases, fulfillment centers. We have fulfillment centers acting as fulfillment centers, which go direct to home and at times they ship to a store, so the inventory can be consolidated with an order and then put into our last mile network.

So it's just not possible for us to break those out, given how blurred the lines have become. But overall, I'd say the team are doing – they're just doing a great job with the contributed profit rates and the mix within – not only the mix within the business like general merchandise versus other things, but within categories, they're doing a great job improving contributed profit rates.

Hey, good morning, and great quarter here. More of a macro question for me. When you look at the data and see how the consumer has allocated these most recent stimulus checks, I'm curious how they compare and contrast to what you saw in April and late December of this past year. Are they still spending at the same amount? Or are we seeing more allocated to savings and, therefore, there's some pent-up demand that could get spent in the coming months?

Brett M. Biggs

Chief Financial Officer & Executive Vice President, Walmart, Inc.

A

Hey, Chuck, this is Brett. Yeah, I think we're seeing a little bit of both. You're seeing customers definitely get out and spend again. The spending rates are good. Income rates are good. But savings rates are actually still almost at an all-time high, which would lead you to believe that there is going to be some pent-up demand as we get to the back half of the year. So in a lot of ways, the consumer balance sheet, unless you're in certain industries that were really impacted by COVID, the consumer balance sheet is about as strong as it's been. Now, a lot of that is due to the stimulus, the money that's gone into the economy that way. But in either case, it would indicate that there's some demand coming.

Operator: Our next question comes from the line of Robby Ohmes with Bank of America. Please proceed with your question.

Q

Hey, good morning, guys. Doug, you mentioned the omnichannel Health & Wellness business. Can you remind us what that can ultimately look like? And maybe weave in what the current like pharmacy recovery, how that's playing out? I know you guys have been involved with vaccines and everything. Anything going on that's going to accelerate the omnichannel healthcare dream for you guys?

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

A

Yeah, Robby, I'll jump in first, and then John can add. I think the pharmacy business has performed really well, considering everything our pharmacists have been doing. It's been an incredible challenge to do everything that they've done since the pandemic started, including all of these vaccinations that they're doing. We did have to shut down our vision centers for a while. Optical, though, is back open, and that's helped a lot. The ultimate destination does look like an omnichannel destination, where we leverage those historical businesses together with new healthcare services and the digital front-end that John mentioned earlier and I mentioned in my remarks with MeMD.

You can imagine a future where we'll be able to reach customers on their devices, in their homes, to help them think about their healthcare in terms of what they eat, how much they move and then what types of healthcare services they need and where they get them. And so I think you can see us building together those capabilities that would help people have access to care, more of an outcomes-based healthcare system, great value, accessibility and serve a lot of people that need to be served and also end up with a really good business that fits together well with a large food retailer. And so we've just been working through that strategy, executing the pieces. And if you look back at the CareZone acquisition, this latest acquisition of MeMD, you can see us adding some capabilities in addition to those that we're building on our own.

John R. Furrer

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

A

And I would just add. Go ahead.

Robert F. Ohmes

Analyst, BofA Securities, Inc.

Q

I was just going to ask you, is this something that longer term fits in with Walmart+ as well?

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

A

We'll get back to you on that, Robby.

John R. Furrer

President & Chief Executive Officer, Walmart U.S., Walmart, Inc.

Robby, this is John. I just want to reiterate excitement for the idea of an omnichannel healthcare solution for customers and Walmart together. Our pharmacists and our pharmacies have performed very well in the last year, given all the challenges they face. They've opened up curbside delivery, delivery to home. We've got

Central Fill Pharmacies now helping assist with costs and efficiency. And the service suite that they offer is, of course, different by state, but the way our teams jumped in and found ways to help get the country vaccinated has been nothing short of amazing. I was in a store here locally last night and just seeing a number of people be able to walk up and get their vaccine was very encouraging.

And then, as Doug said, the market changed last year. We had opened a number of clinics and we continue to open clinics. We're excited about the prospects that clinics bring. And then, a large part of healthcare shifted to digital last year and the entire industry embraced that. So this acquisition of MeMD to enable relationships with customers on their device, in their home and be able to execute service care with our pharmacies and clinics on the back side of that is a really exciting prospect and it's big part of our flywheel going forward.

Operator: Thank you. At this time, we've reached the end of our question-and-answer session, and I'll turn the floor back to Doug for closing remarks.

C. Douglas McMillon

President, Chief Executive Officer & Director, Walmart, Inc.

Just want to close by saying thank you to all of you for following the company so closely. Hopefully, you can see that in addition to the U.S. tailwind, that we've got strength building in the company. As I mentioned, I was in a lot of stores during this last quarter. And standards are improving, in-stock's improving against the challenges that obviously the pandemic brought. But we've also got great momentum and strength in Sam's Club. International had a really good quarter, one of the best quarters, Brett, we've had in a while in International. And the portfolio work that Judith and the team have been doing there is working.

And the situation with the virus in India is tragic. And we'll support not only our own folks, but the country as much as we can to try and get through that. And I'm sure there will be other hot spot cities and countries that we'll deal with in the coming weeks because this pandemic is not over.

But pandemic aside, economic stimulus aside, our focus is on the input metrics, the underlying fundamentals, the capabilities that we're adding. And we see ourselves making real progress against those. The company has changed a lot and there's more change coming. And I'm grateful to the team and excited about the future. Thank you, all.

Operator: This concludes today's conference. You may disconnect your lines at this time. Thank you for your participation.
